THE STRIKE A FAILURE

Honolulu Iron Men Stand by Their Jobs.

EVERYTHING NOW
RUNS SMOOTHLY

The Agitators Will Not Be Taken Back Though They Want to Come.

The strike at the Honolulu Iron Works among the machinists has ended as far as the Iron Works Company is concerned. The company is running a full force of men—about 500 in all departments—and the men who made the trouble for the company several months ago can be said to have lost their battle. Not one of the striking machinists has been taken back, except five half-whites who went back to work yesterday morning.

It was only out of sympathy that these five men were given their old jobs back. They learned their trade in the Iron Works, are married and have families. Before the advent of the machinists and other workers from the Coast they knew nothing of unions. They were drawn into the local machinists' union without knowing what the future would bring to them by reason of their connection with it.

When the white men who headed the union ordered the strike, the half-whites, as well as a number of natives, walked out with them. When the weeks lengthened into months these men saw the folly of their action, and last week they implored the management to take them back. They were not especially needed, but as they had received all their knowledge in the shops here, and would not be able to procure employment elsewhere, they were once more placed on the pay rolls.

A number of the striking whites who came here from the mainland hearing that the half-whites had been taken on, made application to the management for reinstatement but were flatly refused.

"We have won our fight against these men," said J. A. Kennedy yesterday. "We are running a full complement of men. We sympathized with these five half-whites and told them they could return this morning. They did so and promptly sent in their resignations to the union. The men who made the trouble for us have gone to other parts, some to San Francisco, some to the Philippines and some to the Sound country. We won't take on these men. We intend standing by the men who stood by us during the strike, and they, together with those who came into the shops during that time, will be given the preference."

SALOON ON WATERFRONT

longshoremen. The enterprise is conducted by the Klemme Brothers, whose chief stock of supplies yesterday seemed to be the beer of the Honolulu Brewery. In honor of the occasion, the foaming beverage was dispensed free to the thirsty public, who made the most of the opportunity, and became as drunk as possible. It may be said for the visitors that they succeeded most triumphantly in their attempt.

In their haste to make themselves known to the drinking public, the proprietors of the Aloha have thrown open their saloon before the place has been left by the carpenters and painters. The doors are not yet hung; the paint is not yet dry upon the walls, and cigar stumps and shavings littered the floor. The swinging doors are not yet swinging. If they had been last night, they would have been an embarrassment. The windows of the place were raised as high as it was possible to get them, in order to ventilate as much as possible the thick, foul-smelling, over-heated atmosphere.

In serving the free beer yesterday, which was largely foam, little or no attempt was made to get it before the consumer in an artistic manner. The chief and only aim was to get it there. The mixologist is a brawny fellow, devoid of white collar or apron. He seems to have been chosen as much for his ability as a "bouncer" as for his ability to sling beer.

In front of the bar gathered the thirsty, maudlin crowd all day long. Their faces were flushed with too much drink, and the speech of many came thickly and incoherently. Men sang lewd songs and told lewd jests, unmindful of who was listening or who might hear. In little groups about the room, sailor and kanaka discussed with all the seriousness that a drunken man can assume, national questions of grave import, and told each other in strictest confidence, the story of their lives. Roustabout and sailor explained as lucidly as their beer-befuddled brains would allow, wherein this naval commander or that, was woefully weak, or wherein he was unfortunate in not having the kindly advice of the speaker. Longshoreman and waterman, vagabond berated the minions of corporate wealth, and told each other what a cruel world this is, in which the downtrodden sons of toil are oppressed still more, under the unrelenting iron heel of soulless capital.

At present the decorations of the Aloha saloon consist of two chandeliers and a calendar. The cuspidors had not arrived at a late hour last night, and the floor suffered in consequence. The floor could stand it all right, for it is made of rough planking, but was somewhat severe on the sensibilities of those who were sober enough to know.

From appearances it would seem that the proprietors of the liquid emporium intend to spring a novelty on the people of Honolulu in the way of an addition of a "family entrance." What the object of the lean-to in the back yard is, has been explained as an accommodation for the convivial and bibulous members of the gentler sex. The place will have all the accommodations of such an annex. It will, judging from the present chaotic state of its architectural development, be connected with the street. What is equally to the point, it will have a direct connection with the saloon.

Rushing the growler is an art with which Honolulu is not familiar, but already the people in the neighborhood, many of whom are victims of the native intoxicant, swipes, are showing that it needs only the opportunity to develop their sense as to the necessity of the beer can as an article in the domestic economy of the household. Several children were seen last night trotting away from the place with buckets of beer—and foam. Several more did not trot, but no sooner had they made their exit than they proceeded to drink it themselves.

All day long the crowd filled in and out of the place, and it was not until a late hour that the drunken crowd that made the night hideous with their brawlings, subsided into silence, and allowed the neighborhood to go to sleep.

STRUCK A JAP.

A Big Native Boatman Hurts an Asiatic Rival.

Tokonato, an undersized Japanese of 17 years, who propels a boat for his living and has his headquarters at Brewer's wharf, was assaulted Saturday morning by a native boatman, who struck the little fellow on the leg and afterwards kicked him. Tokonato was hit so heavily with an oar that he is scarcely able to walk about. He has sworn to a warrant for the arrest of his assailant, for whom the police are now looking. Tokonato is a prepossessing little Japanese of great enterprise. In his frequent visits to the police station yesterday afternoon and evening he made friends fast and the police are more than willing to serve him. He has to ride in a hack to and fro between the Japanese Hotel, where he lives, and the station house.

From what can be learned of the affair, Tokonato carries passengers for less money than the natives, and they have become embittered against him on this account. During an argument on Saturday the big native who struck him abused him, saying he could not row a boat any distance and shouldn't be allowed to handle oars. Tokonato thereupon offered to race with the native for any distance. This angered the Hawaiian and picking up an oar he struck the boy a cruel blow.
